Brand New Book  Print on Demand .The story of the building of the railway in the Vale of Edeyrnion, North Wales in the mid-nineteenth century unfolds a fascinating sequence of events. Once the railway had arrived the impact on the local economy, in particular agriculture and slate, was significant. No longer was agriculture dependent on canalways and coastal shipping. It remodelled marketing of livestock which was crucial to developing the local economy. and increasing the prosperity of the local inhabitants. Slate production in local quarries increased. By the end of the 1860 s the total slate production in Wales had reached 350,00 tons per year. The local Penarth quarry s contribution to this was small in comparison to the larger quarries of North-West Wales but nevertheless increased both production and employment to levels higher than ever seen prior to the arrival of the railway. A consequence of this was the increase in the volume of transportation resulting in almost doubling the numbers employed in the slate quarries. With its increased wealth the area witnessed many new businesses relocate to the valley. It changed the lives of the ordinary inhabitants who for the first time were able to travel by train to the seaside and Christmas Pantomimes. The first railway to actually arrive in Corwen was the Denbigh, Ruthin Corwen Railway in September 1864, with the Llangollen Corwen Railway following in April 1865. It was however in 1860 that the real story begins, when both railways received Royal Assent. The construction is an episode in itself. We discover the chicanery of one of the contractors whose prevarication delayed the arrival of the Ruthin Corwen Railway. Human tragedy in the building of the...
